

Milky dream

April 19th 21, 2024

Gallery Q, Peder Skrams Gade, Copenhagen 1050

Abandoned objects, in their anonymity, fill the void of space created on the model, milky dream. These objects, stripped of their original purpose and identity, become mere shapes and forms, devoid of history or sentiment. They stand silent and unnoticed, blending seamlessly into the sterile environment. In this space, no labile events take place, and time seems to stand still. The model quickly adapts to these new conditions. All difficulties in the smallest matters are kindly removed, sparing them from the harsh lessons learned through bad experiences that typically poison the first moments of existence. Once acclimated to this setting, the rhythmic ticking of time becomes indistinguishable from the ambient noise, much like the regular chiming of a clock.

Prosaic household furniture, chosen for its lack of distinction, constitutes the visual finishing of the apartment. The pieces create an illusion of completeness, yet they remain conventional elements: melamine, particle board, medium-density fiberboards, vinyl flooring, and high-pressure surfaces. These materials, common in form and used in various configurations, aim to create new systems with desired properties. However, the pursuit of modifications and innovations in the building materials market often leads to an unsettling silence. The quest for purity and reductiveness further diminishes the presence of matter. Materials and surfaces seek the effect of flatness, immaterial abstractness, and timelessness, creating an ethereal illusion. Milky dream.

Anonymous objects combined with the decorative creation made up by a Real Estate Agent, transform into a commercial display embodying ideals of perfection and completeness. A kitchen island is neither enough to grant a room definition nor is it furniture. It occupies an ambiguous space, demanding attention and presence. Puzzling is how a person designing an apartment can place an island in the middle of a room. The artificiality of these solutions is slightly disconcerting. The room, created with meticulous design and collected objects, exudes an appearance of durability and usefulness. The existence of these elements is dictated by the designer, the orchestrator of the milky dream.

The unanimity of experience, through the invisible experience of water circulation in a fridge seamlessly integrated with a kitchen cabinet. Sensory deprivation. A single photograph, reused in various apartment advertisements, perpetuates this illusion. It goes too fast. The rapidity of this process renders personal information irrelevant, and unnecessary. Doesn't matter. In this environment, the anonymity of personal, commercial, and domestic spaces blurs into a narrow, unified experience. It becomes an intuitive invitation, a mute sensory call to engage with the flattened temporality of the model, milky dream.

Julia Laszczka & Peter Højlund Palluth